

though the world has the means to rescue them.

Last month, world leaders met in New York to try and forge a common response to these challenges. Leaders of both rich and poor countries committed themselves to detailed policies which, if fully implemented, could reduce hunger and poverty by 50 per cent in the next ten years. They decided to create new UN bodies for promoting human rights and building lasting peace in war-torn countries. They promised to fight terrorism in all its forms, and to take collective action, when needed, to save populations from genocide and other heinous crimes. They decided on important reforms of the UN Secretariat. But on climate change and Security Council reform they could make only weak statements. And on nuclear proliferation and disarmament they could not agree at all.

They have left us a great deal of work to do. Today, as we mark the 60th anniversary of our indispensable institution, I promise you that I will do my part, and that I will be working with Member States to help them do theirs. I am glad the United Nations can count on the continued support and commitment of you all as we pursue our shared mission."

That concludes the message from the Secretary-General.

Ladies and gentlemen, "the time to reform the United Nations is now. And we must seize this opportunity together." These are words from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in her first speech before the United Nations General Assembly in September.

The 2005 World Summit lived up to being a once-in-a-generation event for the United Nations. With breakthroughs in adopting strategies to fight poverty and disease, creating new machinery to win the peace in war-torn countries, and pledging collective action to prevent genocide, progress was made across a broader front than on any other single occasion in the 60 year history of the organization. Major advancements were made on terrorism, human rights, democracy, management of the Secretariat, peacekeeping and humanitarian response. And doors were opened to further action on global public health, global warming and mediation.

Now, member states will turn to the tough task of implementing what was agreed, and to continue work on the critical differences that remain. Many items must be completed during the 60th session of the General Assembly, ending next September. With so much to do in such a short period of time, civil society will be essential to keeping tabs on progress and keeping all parties involved accountable. While the Summit has come and gone, the hard work is just beginning.

First, on management reform, world leaders committed to reviewing extensive management reforms to make the Secretariat more efficient, more effective and more accountable. This will include a review by the Secretary-General of all ongoing mandates in the first 55 years of the organization, as well as a thorough assessment of the organization's antiquated human resources and budget rules. The Secretary-General is moving forward expeditiously on his own authority to establish an independent ethics office, which will protect whistleblowers and ensure more extensive financial disclosure.

Second, world leaders agreed to strengthen the organization's human rights machinery across the board. The High Commissioner for Human Rights is moving ahead to implement her plan of action, supported by the Summit's commitment to double the office's regular budget. Building on the groundbreaking agreement to create a new Human Rights Council, the President of the General Assembly will soon begin conducting negotiations to finalize agreement on important details.

Third, progress must continue on terrorism. The Summit outcome produced for the first time, an unqualified condemnation of terrorism "in all its forms and manifestations, committed by whomever, wherever and for whatever purposes." The work in the coming months will be to build on that simple statement to complete a comprehensive convention against terrorism by the end of September, and forge a global counter-terrorism strategy that weakens terrorists and strengthens the international community.

Fourth, the final details must be locked down on the Peace-building Commission to get it up and running by the end of the year. Almost all the key details have now been agreed, but the next few months will be critical to operationalizing the commission. The Secretariat is already moving forward to set up a support office and a standing fund to support the commission.

Fifth, with an ambitious commitment to add $50 billion a year for development, the Summit removed any doubt about the global support for the Millennium Development Goals. Every developing country is now pledged to formulate and implement a national strategy bold enough to achieve those development objectives by 2015. For their part, developed countries must now deliver on their pledges to boost financing for development and relieve debt.

With each passing week it becomes dramatically clearer how much the world's leaders agreed to at the Summit. This is equally true about the sheer amount of work ahead. Every effort must be made to see the promise outlined by world leaders fulfilled. If we do that, we will help save millions of lives, and give hope to billions of people—a fitting achievement to mark the 60th anniversary of the United Nations, and a platform from which to do even more in the years ahead.

Let us celebrate United Nations Day.

TRIBUTE TO STEPHEN MOSELEY ON 35 YEARS WITH AED

HON. EARL POMEROY

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, November 1, 2005

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to recognize the remarkable service of a remarkable man, Stephen Moseley, on the occasion of his 35th anniversary with the Academy for Educational Development.

In 1987, AED promoted Steve Moseley to be their President and CEO. Since assuming these responsibilities, he continues to provide dynamic, forward-thinking direction to AED, an organization whose global impact has grown beyond measure under Steve Moseley's leadership.

The reach of AED's mission is incredible. They are operating more than 250 programs in more than 150 countries in Africa, Asia, Europe, Latin America, the Near East and North America.

Their programs address development of human capacity and opportunity, focused on expanding and improving education, health care, and economic growth.

Indeed, education has always been Mr. Moseley's passion. He has devoted himself to increasing access to education for the world's poorest children, strongly supporting Education for All initiatives to get all children into school and serving as the founding chairman of the Basic Education Coalition.

I will never forget the chance I had to accompany Steve Moseley into the countries of Mali and Ghana to observe the girls' basic education program that AED ran in those countries.

Even as I learned of the substance and success of the programs, I closely watched how Steve interacted with the children whose lives were being uplifted and changed at the chance for schooling AED was providing. The gleam in his eye and the beaming smile on his face conveyed the true personal depth and commitment Steve has brought to this mission.

One village elder described the importance of the AED girls' education program as "bringing light into a dark room." The same could be said for the life work of Steve Moseley. He has brought the light of hope and opportunity to thousands of deserving souls in every corner of this world.

Here in the United States, Mr. Moseley has been dedicated to improving educational quality from preschool through college. He has nurtured efforts to improve Migrant Head Start programs, middle-grade education through the Middle Start project, high schools through the Schools for a New Society project, and teacher training through the Teachers for a New Era initiative.

He is very active in the development community, serving on the boards of InterAction, the U.S. Global Leadership Campaign, the Coalition for American Leadership Abroad, and is a member of the steering committee of the International Educational Training Coalition.

A past president of the Washington Chapter of the Society for International Development, Mr. Moseley now sits on the organization's International Governing Council and serves as its treasurer.

Mr. Moseley graduated with a B.A. in English from the University of Hartford in 1967. In 1989 he was awarded a Doctor of Humane Letters, Honorary Degree, by his alma mater, and in 1997 he was elected to the University of Hartford's Board of Regents.

I am pleased to be able to recognize Steve on this milestone and to honor him for a truly remarkable career with the Academy for Educational Development.
